

Caring for Creatures

When you bring home a new pet, your dog, cat, or other creature soon feels like one of the family. Animals can be intelligent, affectionate companions who bring lots of joy.

But many animals don't have a warm and caring home. Some are mistreated, neglected, or abandoned. Others lose their homes due to natural disasters. Or their owners may have to give them up because of poor health or financial trouble.

Our furry, four-legged, and feathered friends deserve respect and kindness. They feel pain just as people do—but they're not able to speak up and get help for themselves. Around the world, rescue centers care for pets, farm animals, and wildlife that need assistance. You can visit the animals, help with their care, or even adopt them.

Compassion for animals makes the world brighter and safer for all creatures—great and small.

"Be infinitely tender and loving to animals. If an animal be sick, let the children try to heal it, if it be hungry, let them feed it, if thirsty, let them quench its thirst, if weary, let them see that it rests."
—Bahá'í Writings
